According to recent studies by a well known wealth research company (Investment Trends), statistics have shown that the growth of new investors trading in Contracts for Difference has climbed 40% in the year 2010 and are expected to grow about the same (40%) in 2011, noted James Peterson a representative of CFDSpy.com. "Both the new and seasoned investors are now getting into this retail derivative." "The numbers have been climbing each month, and shocking to many, it has also been constantly discussed in top CFD Trading news publications, he noted."

The main draw to Contracts for Difference is the ability to trade numerous assets such as commodities, indices, stocks and shares. Peterson also made mention that another critical draw that the investor has the ability to make profit on market fluctuation both the upward and the downward movements.

When asked to explain more about Contracts for Difference Peterson continued, "Most often referred to as CFDs, they are a speculative instrument. It is a contract between broker and investor, each takes opposing sides of what they feel the market movements will do at the close of the position. When the position closes, the investor will either make profit, or have to pay the broker dependent upon the position he took." CFD Trading involves one party going long, as in taking a long position, and one party going short.

Peterson further stated, "Often times, when traders begin in this derivative there is a mid-level learning curve, however, after time they begin to understand how to track and use historical graphing of the market movements which enable them to make more profits by better creating positions." "Statistics have made note, that the traders whom are heavily into share dealing often are able to adapt and create a winning CFD Trading strategy quicker and much more efficiently," he also noted.

In closing, Peterson mentioned, "As with any instrument in investing, all have risks, it is best to begin using a demo account if you are new to CFD Trading. It is also highly important that the trader use due diligence and do the proper CFD broker comparison to ensure they will receive a good fit with their needs, wants and expectations."
